

What Is the First Thing a Social Security Lawyer Will Do?

Q: What is the first thing that will happen after you obtain representation from a social security lawyer?

A: The first thing a social security lawyer will do is familiarize himself with everything in your file, as well as your current medical information. Your attorney will want to thoroughly understand your case. Recent medical information is perhaps the most important thing for a social security lawyer, particularly if your case is in the hearing phase. The SSA will not update any medical information after a reconsideration decision has been made. That means that your medical records can be years old by the time your case is heard before an administrative judge. Your lawyer will assure that the judge has a thorough and current picture of your medical history. It is recommended that your medical data be no older than 2 months.

Q: If you are looking for a social security lawyer, what types of things should you be aware of?

A: It is a good idea to have a list of things to ask social security lawyer candidates before you hire one. For a lawyer that is part of a law firm that deals with various types of issues, you may wish to ask what percentage of their cases pertain to Social Security issues. Ideally, you would choose a lawyer that focuses on social security at least 1/3 of the time. This just assures that you hire someone who has his head in the Social Security game and knows the relevant issues well. You may also want to ask your candidate how many cases he has tried. The more cases a lawyer has tried in court, the more experienced and practiced he will be with your case. Knowing if the attorney has represented cases with similar health conditions to yours can be helpful too. Many attorneys recommend simply asking a potential social security lawyer about the challenges he sees in your case and how he can help. And, lastly, make sure the lawyer you interview is the one who will represent you in court. It is usually not helpful to ask a lawyer the number of wins and losses for social security cases. You will not know anything about the cases, so will not be able to determine if they were difficult or easy cases. The number of cases won, consequently, will not be valuable to helping you determine if he should be your attorney.

Q: Are there asset limitations for SSI?

A: All assets and resources will be considered when you apply for SSI. If you have beyond two thousand dollars worth of countable assets, you will not qualify for SSI. If you own your house and it is your primary residence, it will not count against you. Likewise, the car you drive is not considered a countable asset. Additional cars and property, however, do count. Social Security will also factor in your bank accounts, insurance policies and investments.
