

Will Social Security Work For The Real Disabled

What can I do if the SSA finds that I am no longer disabled and wants to cut off my Social Security benefits? All disability cases are subjected to regular reviews by the Social Security Administration. These review periods vary depending on the particular condition. If the member is expected to recover, a review will be done in 6 to 30 months time. If a possibility that the condition will improve remains, the review will be undertaken after 3 years. If the condition is deemed permanent, a review will be done in 5 to 7 years.

When the time for the review comes, the case will be forwarded to the Disability Determination Services department in order to determine the members continued eligibility for Social Security benefits. A number of questions will be asked regarding the original condition, any changes that have occurred, any treatment that has recently been undertaken, and the work status of the member since the Social Security benefits were given. At this point, a medical examiner will determine whether or not the condition has improved. If it is determined that the member is able to return to work, the Social Security benefits will stop.

If you disagree with the findings of this review process, an appeal may be filed with the office of the Social Security Administration. A hearing will then be done, in which your case will be subject to a reconsideration. If the decision to discontinue your Social Security Benefits still stands, you may make an appeal in a federal district court or present your case before a judge of administrative law.

Will SSA pay me to care for my disabled spouse? While there is currently no provision in the SSA that will directly pay you to care for your disabled spouse, you may be eligible to receive certain benefits once your spouse receives Social Security benefits. These benefits are given monthly and can be equal to 50 percent of the disabled spouses benefits. Keep in mind that there is a limit to the total amount of social security benefits that can be given to a family based on your spouses Social Security account.

The VA found me disabled. Wont SSA come to the same conclusion? Unfortunately, the SSA system does not gauge varying levels of disability, unlike the VA system. Therefore, while you may be eligible for benefits under the VA system even if you are only partially disabled, there is still a chance that you may be turned down by the SSA. Other articles Florida social security lawyer

About the Author

For more about disability attorney, stop in at hillandponton.com.

Source: <http://learnitarticles.com>